JAMES GILBERT

To conceive, create, compose all to connect this is the role of a musician, usually it is shared with other players and the collaborations between them is what the listener seeks, ultimately to relate the sounds played to themselves. On occasion the player is alone, making the connection to the listener on a much more personal level.

Nostalgia and memorized passages play a part on this performance, but the ultimate aim is to establish that intimacy when the new is explored, in the moment, and the transcendence and joy of birth is shared both by the player and the listener. Then there is a real connection, but of course not all births are easy and sometimes there is a struggle, even failure, but ultimately there is only renewal. The tools for this communication will be the soprano saxophone and the piano.
