“A new international collaboration finds Swiss Pianist Daniel Roser, Dutch Percussionist Gustan Asselbergs and American Trombonist and Countertenor David Whitwell beginning to search for a new path in improvised music. Drawing on extensive experience from traditional jazz, early and contemporary western art music and their own personal histories these three voices hold a clarity of musical idea above all else, acknowledging the immense trust placed in them by their audiences- the group believes that music happens to an audience not only intellectually but also corporally, and thusly they bring a style of improvisation that is immediately approachable, mixing freely improvised musical situations with pre planned forms and melodies. They seek to provide not entertainment yet not meditation, but something in between, leaving space in their music not only for each other, but for the audience to find something they may be searching for”
